PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

To All Seniors:

The "Senior Saga" is our book, written and edited by our fellow students who have worked devotedly to make this January 1936 edition an outstanding one for us. The editors have selected material that will be pleasant to read and that will make our book a treasured possession, an almanac of our high school days. It will bring back memories of the amiable four years spent in Theodore Roosevelt High School, which we may live over again as we turn its pages.

During these years, we have practically lived together in a small "democracy," intent upon preparing for our future tasks. Some have struggled to go through this "democracy" and others have gone through easily, but in spite of everything we might say, we have all enjoyed it.

Out of these years have grown numerous friendships, some of which, we hope, will continue through the years to come. Others will have to come to an end, but will leave with us fond lasting memories. We have benefited immeasurably through the personal contact with our teachers and advisers who have, by their patience and understanding, instilled in us the respect and admiration they so richly deserve. We shall always cherish the friendship extended to us by them at a time when we needed it, for a "Friend in need is a friend indeed."

And now, at the end, who knows, there might emerge from among us a business executive, a great politician, an author or a poet? But regardless of what we may turn out to be, we have this to be thankful for, and that is our background provided by Theodore Roosevelt High School.

A PARTING THOUGHT

When the echoes of the glamour and excitement of graduation have died away, we find ourselves at the starting point of a long journey. The lone sign on the narrow road reads "To Success," and as we look down the winding path, we realize, not without a thrill, that this is the road we have so long sought. A single glance down a short length of the path, however, reveals only too clearly, that it is fraught with numerous problems, with none of which we have ever before coped.

The road, as we look at it, is cluttered on either side with failures who have not learned to utilize their resources to advantage, and so have fallen by the wayside. Countless numbers have trodden this path to success before us, some of whom had little or no training. We are fortunate in being well armed with superb equipment—knowledge, and we are, we earnestly hope, about to set out on the road and to use it wisely.

With the difficult road in view, our training ready for instant use, and with the thought of other successful graduates in mind, let us set out on this journey resolved: First, that we will set up as a goal an objective worthy of our Alma Mater and of ourselves; second, that we will cease struggling only when we have attained the goal we strove to reach.

A GLANCE TO THE FUTURE

The course of our lives is about to be readjusted. Shedding the responsibilities of high school, we adopt new ones, large in comparison. During those four years of study, we possessed a feeling of security, seeing the path spread before us, knowing that it could be trod with an exertion of a certain amount of effort and perseverance. Now uncertainty visits us. Life contains so many paths and by-ways. Which one shall we pursue? Our high school education has helped to a certain extent to show us what course to follow. Success may come to many of us who can confront our problems unflinchingly, treating them for what they are worth.

This is the time when the problems which have arisen during our past school-life will seem mere trivialities to our experienced state of mind. It will seem hardly conceivable that we had attached so much importance to them. Perhaps, our acquaintance with these little problems will make us less vulnerable later on.

When life grows more and more intricate, we may be likely to repeat that age-old expression, "I wish I had my school days back again." In fond regard, we shall endeavor to recall those days. How discomfoting it would be if those memories had perished with the years, and nothing was at hand to revive them! That is the time when the "Senior Saga" will assume infinite value. A living memorial it will be, where the faces of students, hopeful and happy, look up from the pages, and where the thoughts of seniors are recorded. It may be of real value in helping us to regain a small part of the confidence that was typical of the high school age.

CAROLINE RIEF

LA DERNIERE CLASSE

Ting-a ling-a ling! I rolled over and gradually came to the realization that today was Friday and that the final marks were to be computed that afternoon. "Well", thought I, "if I shine in my lessons today, they'll give me a good mark for the term, maybe."

Five seconds later I was gulping scalding cocoa and munching a roll. Ten seconds after that I climbed on a bus to dash to school to do some homework. What earthly good homework at such a time could do, I can't now possibly imagine, but, at any rate, that thought entered my head and stuck. Never before or after have I ridden on such a slow bus, but at last I reached school, raced to my locker, put my coat away, picked up a book and began to study Latin. The bell rang, interrupted my studies and brought back to my mind the fact that we would not have Latin today because of a meeting of the language teachers. With a dejected air I went to my class, took out what was supposed to be my mathematics book, and waited.

"Benjamin," said Miss Deutelbaum, addressing me, "please read the first paragraph on page 287."

I opened my book to page 287, glanced at the first paragraph and began,

"That make the bells of Heaven to peal
Round pillows frosty with the feel
Of Death's cold finger tips—

The laughs of the class and Miss Deutelbaum's expression made me turn the book over; I saw the title, "Contemporary Poetry," Edited by Marguerite Wilkinson.

"Well, Benjamin," said Miss Deutelbaum, "thank you for the rather flowery mathematics so early in the morning. Louise, will you please read the paragraph?"

Needless to say, my chances of a passing mark in mathematics were wrecked by that episode.

Thoughts of the next period were more cheering. Our art class was going to look at slides of Roman buildings and such, which left me in the dark anyway, so I had a little nap. My glimpses of the Coliseum, Parthenon, and the like helped my appetite and, despite the misfortunes of the day, I ate a hearty meal.

With my vocal chords carefully adjusted to the intricate mechanical effects required by him who would converse freely in the French language, I swallowed hastily the last bite of a baked apple and hastened to the French class. There I was called upon to conjugate some French verbs.

Perhaps the presence in the room of Mr. Flood, the teacher of that lovely language, Latin, confused me; at any rate I construed some Latin, much to the delight of the class, who thought I was making fun of the classical teacher. I was innocent of any such attempt; but as the French was lacking and the Latin was wrong, I lost caste with both departments.

Forty-five minutes is not an infinite period, and at last I was in the corridor breathing freely, for only chemistry and gym remained. In chemistry we had been doing experimental work. I could get through that easily, and who's afraid of gym?

Much to my distress, however, in chemistry, Mr. Branson, the instructor, asked us to sit up in front, and there he promptly sounded our wells of knowledge for information.

"Josephine," he inquired, "what happens when you pour hot concentrated sulphuric acid on zinc?"

Josephine knew! Not the answer to the question: no, no! She knew that she did not know and said so.

Mr. Branson said something about too many "pink teas," "getting lost in the fog," etc., and passed the question on to me. I also knew that I didn't know, but I didn't say so. What I did say was:

"Well, sir, you get a chemical reaction between the hydrogen of the acid and the hydrogen of the zinc, forming water and evolving carbon dioxide gas—"

"Oh, you do, do you?" satirically from Mr. Branson. "That's news to me."

"Yes, sir," I went on, encouraged, "the residue, zinc hydrate and hydrochloric acid, unite to form hydrogen sulphide and lead sulphate, an insoluble salt—"

"What!"

"An insoluble salt," I repeated, to gain time to think. "If you want to continue further you dissolve the lead sulphate in the water and add the combination of hydrogen sulphide and carbon dioxide. The hydrogen in the hydrogen sulphide explodes—"

"Explodes?" he interrupted witheringly. "That's obliging of it."

"Yes, sir; explodes and scatters sulphur all over the room, while the oxygen puts out the fire—"

"Oxygen! Puts out fire!"

"Yes, sir, puts out the fire and the carbon forms in pink sticks along the ceiling."

"Pink sticks of carbon! Great Scott! Well, Benjamin," he said, glowering at me over his glasses, "thank you for the recitation. It confirms me in the mark I have thought of giving you for the term."

And that was that.

"Well, anyhow," I thought, "gym is next and there I shall make a good mark."

But the notice on the gymnasium door read simply:

TO THE SENIORS. NO GYM TODAY

Mr. Dreeben

"At least," thought I, "he won't have to spend the afternoon to compute my mark."

ONE LUCKY POET

Characters

CLEMENT an elderly man who has become prosperous in spite of his eccentricities

CAROL an American girl, intensely practical, and cannot, therefore, be expected to appreciate the romance of her surroundings

PETER a Bohemian poet, extremely idealistic and intensely romantic

POVLOFF a Russian with an inventive turn of mind who has been trying to invent a collapsible soapbox so as to be able to carry it with him at all times

AMELIA Clement's friend

PATRICK HENRY SAMUELS an American ex-senator whose chief virtue is in his being the father of Carol

Scene

The play takes place in the dining room of a small castle in Bohemia. The castle stands on a hill, and is reputed to be haunted by the ghost of a handsome Hussar. It is evening. In the dining room the darkness has been exiled to the corners by means of candlelight. As the play opens, the guests are seated at the table.

AMELIA (shouting across the table to Carol) And how do you like my country, my dear?

CAROL It's very nice, but it's difficult to find chewing gum to buy.

AMELIA But, my dear, you are in a castle. Why, anything could happen here.

CAROL I don't believe in fairy tales.

CLEMENT Do you believe in ghosts?

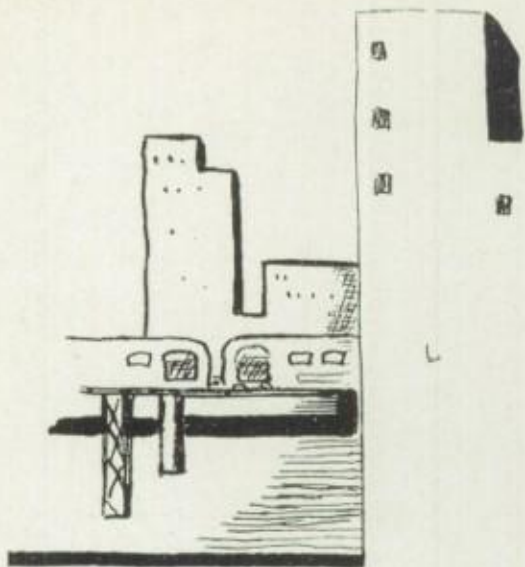

POVLOFF I believe that some day the ghosts of the capitalists will——

CLEMENT (interrupting rudely) We have a ghost in the place here.

CAROL Tell us about him. Is he handsome?

CLEMENT Extremely so. He was a Hussar, a cavalry soldier, who loved a beautiful girl in the village below, and one day the Baron from this castle saw her and immediately fell in love with her. She spurned him and told him she loved another. This, of course, angered the Baron and he determined to get rid of his rival, the soldier. One day he was falsely accused of stealing and, in spite of the denials of his guilt, he was convicted and hanged. And it is his ghost that walks the castle with the noose still around his neck, looking for the Baron.

SAMUELS You couldn't get the people back home to believe a story like that.

POVLOFF No; they believe in the fairy tale of government by the people.

SAMUELS (angrily) What do you mean, fairy tale? Let me tell you—

CLEMENT Please, ladies and gentlemen. You have all been wondering, no doubt, why I have invited you here. Fifteen years ago each of you helped me in some way and I determined to reward you all, but I have since found that none of you deserve to be rewarded. Nevertheless, I am going to give it to the one who is a trifle more deserving than the others, if there is such a person. You, Povloff, gave me the philosophy by which I triumphed in later life. But you acquired it from Machiavelli and, therefore, you deserve no credit for any effort on your part, Povloff.

POVLOFF But without my eloquence you would not have been so readily convinced.

CLEMENT (ignoring him) You, Samuels, sold me a piece of land at a very low price which later became the foundation of my present fortune. But you sold it to me only because you believed it to be worthless.

CAROL (sarcastically) Father, how clever!

CLEMENT Amelia, you showed me the joys of love, but only to serve your own selfish ends. There is the case, my would-be friends. Carol, who do you think should receive the reward?

SAMUELS Now, Carrie, you know I wouldn't do such a thing.

CAROL Well, (speaking in a very disinterested manner) I can't say that anyone should have it.

AMELIA (screaming) The ghost, there, at the door!

CLEMENT There's no one there.

AMELIA Yes, yes, there was. (A crash off stage seems to confirm her words. The men rush out to make a search.) Don't let's stay here. I'm afraid. Let's go out. (As they leave, a figure cautiously creeps into the room. It is a ghost. He is dressed in a Hussar uniform with red pants, a blue jacket, and cape. A noose is around his neck. He is headed for the window but is arrested by the sight of the food on the table. He seats himself in Clement's chair and begins to eat. Carol, coming into the room, stops in astonishment. But for once the haunter is more startled than the haunted.)

GHOST (recovering first) Go—go away. (He waves his arms menacingly, forgetful of the chicken leg in his hand.)

CAROL Are you the ghost? I've never seen one before. (She comes farther into the room.)

GHOST (retreating toward the window) I warn you. Go on your way. (His voice is hollow and hoarse.)

CAROL Have you a cold? That's what you get for running around in draughty castles.

GHOST Madam, I—you—really, this is not the way to treat a ghost.

CAROL Now don't tell me you are really a ghost.

GHOST At times I have almost been a ghost. But I am something much worse. I am a poet, a poet by choice, a ghost only from necessity.

CAROL And what is a ghost-poet doing in a strange house eating someone else's dinner? But where did you get that moth-eaten uniform?

GHOST It isn't moth-eaten.

CAROL Yes, it is. (She sticks her finger in a hole in his sleeve.) What sort of poetry do you write?

POET (enthusiastically) My poetry is full of the music of my people. In it is the odor of sun-drenched pine needles and of the mushrooms in the woods. In it is all the romance and the color and the warmth of my country.

CAROL That sounds good. Does it pay?

POET Not very well. So far I am the only person who thinks my poetry is great. But let me introduce myself. (He clicks his heels and bows.) My name is Peter. Two days ago while on a walking tour, I found this castle with a cellar door unfastened, and I climbed in, for it was a rainy night. I slept in the attic overnight and when I woke up in the morning I found the house full of servants. Now, what could I do? How could I get out unseen? So when I saw this uniform I remembered the ghost story and decided to get out that way. But I got lost and I blundered into the dining room. When the lady screamed I ran into the next room and knocked over a table. I intended to go out this window, but I was hungry and then you caught me.

(The host and the other guests enter.)

CLEMENT Hal! so you've laid the ghost, Carol? What do you mean by this, you thief?

PETER I am not a thief. I am merely a poet.

CAROL Wait! This is my friend, Peter, the Poet from Prague.

CLEMENT If he's your friend, then, of course, it's all right, but I still—

SAMUELS Carol, where did you meet him?

CAROL Never mind, father.

CLEMENT (to Peter) Won't you join us?

PETER I thank you. You are very kind.

CLEMENT (speaking softly) Are you interested in him?

CAROL Yes, I am, strangely enough.

(They seat themselves at the table.)

CLEMENT I am sorry that our dinner has not progressed more smoothly but I am sure the young man is most welcome. (He casts a kindly glance upon Peter.) Since none of you have earned the reward I spoke of, and since you, Carol, have no need of it, I propose to give it to our ghostly poet.

AMELIA Joseph! How can you?

CLEMENT He deserves it if only for the laugh I got, seeing you tear down the stairs as if a regiment of ghosts was after you. Besides, he has a likable face, and probably will have more use for the money than any of you would have. Therefore, Peter, I give you five thousand pounds and the deed to this castle so that you can play ghost whenever you please.

PETER Five thousand pounds!

CAROL Oh, Peter, you can publish your mushroom-scented poems now.

POVLOFF If you gave it to me—

SAMUELS You would be a capitalist and could use your oratory in after-dinner speeches.

PETER Oh, Miss Carol, you have brought me this good fortune. Will you allow me to show you my country? Will you come as my guest?

CAROL You bet I will. I'll even let you quote your poetry to me.

ON THE BRIDGE

"There's romance in bridges." I, too, discovered this, one foggy, inclement day in November when I viewed the waters of the Hudson from the George Washington Bridge.

I was quite alone, for on such days few visitors walk over the bridge. The many automobiles whizzing by were not disturbing, for they moved so quickly that one was unconsciously aware of the pleasing sounds coming from precise coordination. Perhaps as they hurriedly moved along, the drivers noticed a girl leaning against the railing, staring fixedly at all the magnificence about her.

The stately majesty of the mountains vied with the sublimity of this steel structure called bridge. Insurgent waters rolled and tossed beneath, and the sky above was dim and night was coming on winged feet. The distant fog horns sounded exactly as I had imagined they would. I saw tug boats, steamers, and ferries pass by.

It was really dark now and lights of the bridge had long since been lit.

The mountains were gray and the sky dark, the river alive with boats and sounds, and I heard noisy cars pass me by. Reality had come apace.

EDNA McCLATCHEY

DISGUISES

It was a little shop tucked away in a secluded section of old Prague. It was so small and weatherbeaten as to be hardly noticeable among the other small, weatherbeaten shops and houses that fringed the cobbled square. I would surely have passed it by had not the curious information on the small sign above the door attracted my attention.

"J. Smetana," it said, "Dealer in Disguises. Conceal your personality in one of my creations." I stepped up closer and attempted to peer through the window pane. All that I saw there was a wig or two, resembling nothing so much as a bird's nest. I was greatly tempted to step inside and investigate this curious place of business, but at the top of the short flight of steps that led into the inner darkness of the shop, I hesitated. What excuse could I possibly give for entering and not purchasing anything? But extreme curiosity led me on, and I stepped into the gloomy interior.

As I entered, I was assailed by a powerful cloud of tobacco smoke. While I stood there coughing, a cheery voice accosted me and a figure seemed to materialize from the shadows. My eyes were becoming accustomed to the light, or rather lack of it, and as I replied to his greeting, I studied the man before me.

The proprietor was a man of medium height and age, and of extreme thinness. His voice seemed strangely unfitted to him, for it was a cheery voice of a man who might be described as "fat and jolly." I idly wondered if he had not developed this tone of voice to conceal the sadness of his face and eyes, eyes that were mild and blue but despairing. His mustache looked as if it had been many a day since it had felt the touch of a ministering hand.

In answer to his inquiries, I said that I was going to a masquerade ball and was in need of a costume. He laid down his pipe and fumbled in the pocket of his rusty trousers for so long a time that I half expected him to produce a costume from that region. But all he took out was a pair of spectacles, and balancing them precariously on his nose, he favored me with a glance of mild reproof.

"I do not deal in costumes," he said. "I deal only in disguises."

I was, for the moment, unable to grasp the point of difference, but I asked to be shown whatever he had.

"What would you wish to be?" he inquired, wiping his spectacles carefully and banishing them to his dark pocket.

"I don't know. What have you to offer?"

"Well—," he paused and looked around, "I can disguise you as a merchant, a doctor, a teacher, a policeman, or—an actor—or as almost anyone you wish to be," he concluded.

By this time my curiosity was thoroughly aroused and I wanted a demonstration of his ability. "I think I'd like to be an actor," I said. He frowned.

"That is rather difficult and I don't like to do it. Wouldn't you rather be a policeman?" But I was determined.

"Well," he said reluctantly, "If you insist."

I assured him I did, and he set to work.

"First, he said, "you must get into the proper mood. You should read books on the Theatre. I have some here." He pulled a few books out of a drawer. Among them I could see a biography of Sarah Bernhardt and a copy of "Nove Divadlo."

"It is very important," he went on, "to believe you are an actor, to think and live as an actor. If you really want to convince yourself you should make the rounds of the theatrical agents each morning. You should drink beer at the Theatre Gardens and discuss with a patronizing air the performance of the star of the National Theatre and how much better you would do it if you had the part. You should stand in the rain, waiting on the bare possibility that you may be able to purchase a ticket in the third balcony to see him perform. Ah," he sighed and blew his nose savagely.

"Is that all there is to the disguise?" I ventured to ask after he had mastered his sudden and surprising emotion.

He pulled himself up. "No. After you are in the right mood, you will go to the shop of Pau Hlovek, the tailor, and get the right clothes. All actors used to gather in his shop and gossip and—" he paused. Then in a firmer voice he concluded, "Then I guarantee that you and all the others will think that you have always been an actor."

He seemed to fall into a reverie and I did not disturb him. I took this opportunity to look around. There was not much to see. A heterogeneous collection of furniture was scattered about the small room. On a rack by the window were a number of mustaches. They, in common with the whole shop, had a dejected appearance. The place and its proprietor seemed to me to be fantastic, unworldly. I wondered what had given him the idea for the business. What could "J. Smetana" have once been? Surely he had not always been hidden away in this shop. I gazed idly at a few photographs upon the wall, photo-

the ship as if it were a cork. The ocean continually washed the deck. Huge cracks appeared in the hull.

At nine the captain commanded all to the life-boats. The ship had to be abandoned. The sea had proved itself too powerful an adversary.

Ten found the lifeboats, perilously riding the waves. The lowering had been accomplished without much difficulty. Five of the crew were in each boat. The wireless operator had signalled for help and already three steamers were rapidly approaching.

At two A.M. the first steamer hove into sight. It was a matter of a few minutes before all the people were picked up. The captain sent them to the dining room in order to check the list. At the first count it was discovered that all were present or accounted for but one. A second re-check revealed that a certain John, last name illegible, was missing.

HERMAN ROSEN

YAWNING

A yawn is something likely to occur to anybody, and like a concussion of the brain or a broken garter strap, it is usual for it to happen at the most inopportune moments. The proper control of a yawn is therefore a matter deserving some attention.

In the privacy of the home, the worst hazard of yawning is the possible dislocation of the jaw, but at a social function it may prove more disastrous. Every effort, therefore, should be made to reduce the possibilities of a yawn to the minimum. If it is not more than a young and little yawn, it may sometimes be checked by the gritting of the teeth, and while holding the breath, counting slowly up to ten.

If it turns out to be a big yawn, this process may prove disastrous. The yawn thwarted in its natural behavior will trickle out through the eyes, nose and roots of the hair and the yawner will break out into a cold perspiration which will betray him at once to every experienced eye.

Maybe it is best to let the yawn take its natural course and cover it up as best may be. This may be done by placing one or more hands before the yawn as gracefully as possible. If both hands are occupied, as in dealing cards, the situation becomes more difficult. Possibly the best thing to do is to turn the yawn into a loud and hearty laugh.

Amid the questioning glances that follow this hilarious outburst, it is considered good taste to think up an adequate reason for this unexpected merriment. This may prove difficult but not quite so difficult as to explain a plain, unvarnished yawn to a suspicious group of friends or relatives.

RALPH SCOPPA

STUDYING THE STUDY HALL

The Fourth of July comes once a year. Everyone awaits its arrival with great enthusiasm and noise-making devices. To live through one day out of three hundred and sixty-five days of nerve-shattering noise, is a blessing. To live through two hundred days is absolute murder.

I clearly remember my first visit to Theodore Roosevelt's study hall. Being under the impression that silence is essential in study, I entered noiselessly on tip-toes. By the whispering and noises that met my ears, I judged that this place was different from what it was said to be. I was in the act of occupying a seat, when suddenly the blast of a police whistle nearly burst my eardrums. I whirled around, expecting to see an officer of the law performing his duty, but lo and behold, the sight I perceived was one I shall never forget. Standing in the center of the aisle, her arms waving in such a manner that would make a band leader envious, she stood tall and defiant, shouting for silence. After a few attempts, she finally succeeded, and returned to her chair. The performance over, I opened a book intent on studying. I had hardly begun when a wave of music filled the hall. An instructor was giving some pupils lessons on how to play the organ. No sooner had the organ lessons ended, than a few amateur actors began to rehearse a play on the stage, I came to the conclusion that the only person who could succeed in studying in this hall must be absolutely deaf. The actors were in quite bacchantic mood when the period ended.

Before taking my departure, I questioned a student if these incidents happened daily. He replied that this was the customary routine of the study hall, and aside from police whistles, shouting, organ playing, rehearsals, and various other elements, the auditorium was considered a very appropriate place in which to spend periods for close study.

HOPE AND FAITH

Hope is young,
Everlasting and beautiful
Wondrous and mysterious
Alive and fiery
Vivid and fearless.
Faith is soft,
Unchangeable and endless
Humble and unhesitating

True and steady
Constant and comforting.
Hope and faith,
Virtues two,
Sweet and sometimes sad
Proud and dear,
That stays with lass and lad.

SYLVIA MOSKOWITZ

IT HAPPENED IN ENGLAND

Lord Cedric Forsythe was hunting. At least, he was supposed to be hunting, but at that moment he was mingling his snores with the song of the birds and the rustling of the wind in the trees. It was late afternoon; not that Lord Cedric was aware of the time, for that noble gentleman had been peacefully wrapped in oblivion since early afternoon. He was the type of gentleman who forgot things until the last minute, and then rushed to get them done on time. He had never yet missed anything of importance to him. He slept the sleep of the innocent and the just, for innocent and just he was.

He slowly opened his eyes and became aware of the exquisite beauty of the setting sun. He watched in rapture the delicate coloring of the skies as the sun bid the earth good-night until another day. When it was gone, he sighed for the lost glory of the sunset. With something akin to a groan, he sat up. With another sigh, he glanced at his watch. He sat there, petrified. His watch couldn't possibly be right. He brought it to his ear. Yes, it was right. Like a frightened rabbit, he jumped up and ran. It was a mile from his cabin and he had only five minutes left.

He prayed as he ran, "Lord, please don't—please don't let it be finished." The perspiration stood out on his brow; his breath was coming in pants; it was torture to take a breath. And still he ran. On and on, over hill and dale, through a small brook that rippled angrily as he plunged through it. Never, never had he missed this. Never, never had he been too late. Ah, his luck couldn't fail him; he'd reach that cabin in time.

His head was tossed back in an effort to breathe in a few lungfuls of fresh air. His heavy shirt was soaked in perspiration. Only one more bend to turn and he would be home. He staggered to the cabin, and flung open the door. His dazed eyes took in his wife and brother comfortably reading, the dishes piled in the sink. He slowly sank to the floor in a dead faint. He was too late—his wife and brother had finished tea.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT LEGENDS

In my last term in school, I feel that there are some things about Theodore Roosevelt that will never be forgotten. I therefore choose to call them legends. They are:—

That being late for the first period constitutes a good excuse for spending the remainder of the day in Loew's Paradise

That every club affair is attended by everybody except club members

That if you pretend to be intelligent you might fool yourself into passing your subjects

That when one sees a ticket seller, before the ticket seller sees him, the ticket seller will never see him

That the motion pictures have been making our book reports easier

That Theodore Roosevelt is the best school in the Bronx

That if one enters a classroom before the late gong rings, he is a sissy

That if you fail a subject for the first half of the term, you have to be nice to the teacher of that subject for the second half of the term

That the difference between the old days and the new is that instead of getting our report cards four times a term, we now see the bad news twice a term

That the students are always more intelligent than the teachers

That you are supposed to go down an UP staircase and up a DOWN staircase

That the most interesting subjects are discussed in the halls of the school, and not in the classrooms

That a good Rooseveltian is one who is eager to go to his classes. After holding a conversation until the late gong rings, you see him dashing through the halls, pushing whatever may be in his way out of his way, in his great anxiety to get to his class before the teacher

That a sense of humor is appreciated by the teachers (Laugh and the world laughs with you.....)

That being unprepared is a good reason for cutting a subject

That if they didn't cause the students sleepless nights and grey hair before their time, the teachers are really human

That after looking forward to the senior term all through high school, upon reaching that distinguished stage, it doesn't feel very much different than previous terms

Still dresses simply—carries six books—does homework for two hours—drops Glee Club—attends only big games—looks down upon "freshies"—never speaks to a boy unless she must—flunks a couple of subjects

JUNIOR STAGE

Dresses smartly—drops out of Service League—carries only books she must—does an hour's homework—begins to realize that masculine sex can be spoken to—makes a close acquaintance of the Dean—complains of the way the school is run—attends no games but is content with being able to speak glibly of our records—forced to drop some subjects

SENIOR STAGE

Dresses fastidiously—invests in cigarette holder for state occasions—walks to school with a boy—attends all dances—carries as many books as will fit in her escort's overcoat pocket—does all homework in official period—complains of how school is run and recalls "the good old days"—knows every athlete by sight—cuts a period or so a week—complains at the large class dues—finally with much perspiration and the aid of many others, she graduates and appears in history as the first (in her own estimation) and the most important graduate of Roosevelt

THE LOVE BIRDS

(With apologies to the boy and girl on Fordham)

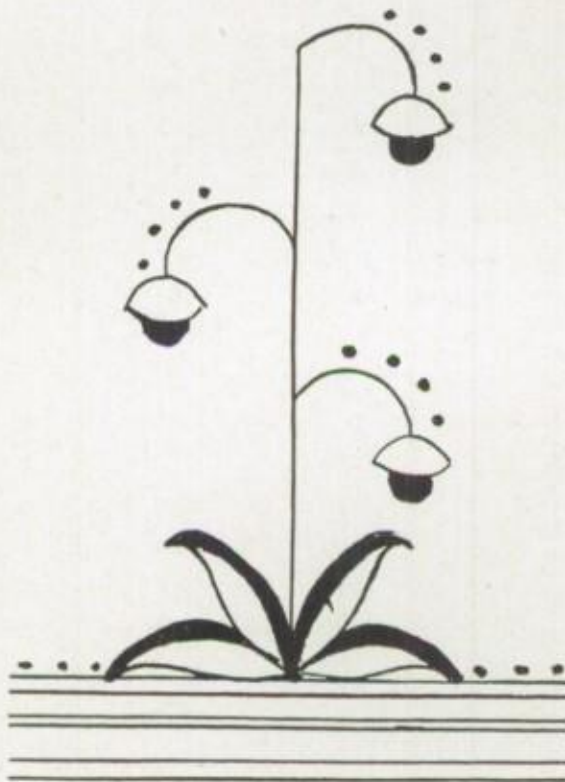

Rain or shine, snow or hail,
Throughout the term, 't will never fail.
Two little lovebirds stand and coo
At Webster and Fordham Avenue.
Love on Fordham must be grand
To stand and stand, and hold one's hand.
The boys and girls in the trolley sigh
When they pass the lovers by.

CONCERNING ANSWERS

The answer that's blunt
Carries a sting,
While a harsh reply
Brings suffering.
The answer that's rough
Creates a wall,
But silence is the cruelest
Answer of all.

CLAIR NATHAN

F A M E

It was in his First Term of High School that he made the Football Team. He was given a Place on the Varsity and more than once proved his Worth. During the Season he accumulated more Points than any other Player in the City. It was only a Fumble in the last Quarter of the Most Important Game of the Season which lost The Game for his Team and put it out of the Running. This Record ate into his Heart and engraved Itself There.

Then and there he secretly conceived and cherished Ambition for a Perfect Record in Scholarship also. The Marks came easily enough, for he was a Brilliant Boy and he had the Ability to do Good Work if he tried Hard Enough. This came in his Second Year at High School. His Marks were so High that they set a Record which still stands in This School.

He then turned to Other Things. The former Achievements incited him to leave an Indelible Mark on the Memory of the School. He would institute Reforms in the School and Champion the Cause of Right. He made Fiery Speeches at Assemblies and regardless of the Opposition insisted that he was Right.

This he accomplished in his Third Year, for he was Brilliant and his Arguments carried Conviction. But he still was not satisfied with his Record. There was still a Desire for More Fame.

In his last year at High School he turned towards Literature. The School Paper was filled with his Stories, Poems, Jokes, Editorials, and News about the School in general. His Work was exceedingly good and was noted by All the Teachers. He told himself that he would not be forgotten by the School for a Long Time and he was Well Content. . . .

It was Four Years later that he returned to the School. Amused by the Remembrances of Youthful Ambition, but not unwilling to taste the Joys of Fame and Universal Respect, he went forth to seek Acclaim. No one knew him except his Teachers.

"What, none?"

But no, one Callow Youth professed to remember him.

"Wasn't it you," he said, "who fumbled the ball in that important Football Game some years ago? Yes, I remember—Something—oh, yes. It lost the Championship for our Team!"

It gives you breath and a heart
And plants you among your race;
That is your start.
Have no fear.

It hovers about you
Taking its toll,
Until it contacts you
And leaves only a soul.
Have no fear.

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF THE

We, the Senior Class of January 1936, being sound of body, sound of mind (in spite of all the faculty has done to make it otherwise), do hereby draw up, make, constitute, leave, bequeath as well as donate, the following more or less useful articles to the following more or less useless beneficiaries:

TO:

Mr. Rogers	A hearty vote of thanks from all those who think "You're the top."
Mr. Leder	Eau de Toilette Eau de Nuit Eau de Cologne A cook book
Mr. Durkin	A mechanical robot to type his tests correctly and know when to leave out the hard questions
Mr. Hellerbach	A maxim silencer
Mr. Trent	A course in memory training
Miss Caro	A box of grapenuts
Miss Baylis	Marie Gamberelli and the Ballet Russe
Mr. Casey	A piece of "Hamm"
Mrs. Goldstein	A promise for a Roosevelt anti-noise committee
Mr. Roseman	A copy of the criminal code so that he may brush up on his rules and regulations
Miss Scully	A rubber stamp which stamps ten zeros at a time
Mr. Lerner	A horse for $10
Mrs. Lerner	An orchid to you
Miss Jaffe	A lollypop to go with her jovial smile
Mr. Newman	A dictaphone that has the letters already dictated
Mr. Pasner	A jokebook that hasn't been published
Mrs. Feldman	A sweet disposition to harmonize with her major keys
Mr. Godnick	A good 5c cigar
Mrs. Newhall	A stage hook to oust the students out of study hall
Mr. Sendler	An assistant to teach his classes history while he relaxes

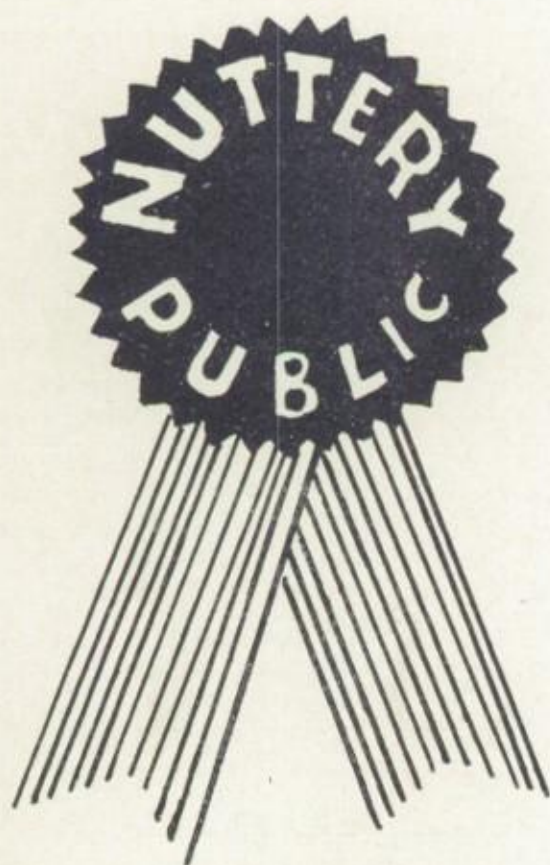

SENIOR CLASS OF JANUARY 1936

Miss Taintor	A case of bottled water from the Fountain of Youth to revive her when the Square Deal finally goes to press
Mrs. Schneider	A thirty-six-hour day for her Statesman Club
Mr. Bloom	An addition to his vocabulary, the word being MISS
Miss Moran	A class that takes dictation at five hundred words a minute
Mr. Elliffe	A silk cravat to show us how he will look when he is not wearing his usual bow-tie
Mr. Kuntz	A five-year diary listing all his children's doings
Dr. Wepner	"Thanks a Million"
Miss Smith	An appreciative audience for her superb acting
Miss Chapman	A director's job in Hollywood
Miss Hufeland	An Artistic Aristocratic Arista
Mr. Nagelberg	Twenty true, trusty teachers who will get their book requests in on time and send them back when they say they will
Mr. White	A megaphone to sing his choruses to the orchestra when directing
Mr. Lutz	A counter in the Lunchroom
Mrs. Richards	where they can sell all the "Apple-sauce" that's handed to them
To All Eco Teachers	Pensions
To the English Department	Writer's Cramp
To the Senior Grade Advisers	A mallet and a chisel to carve themselves a Senior Class that has some boys as officers
T.R.O.	A bank
To the Stockroom Squad	Marshall's book on "Graft" and thanks for past favors
To the Faculty	All homework exceeding twenty minutes

In the presence of no witness, on this day on which we are leaving the school, we, the Senior Class, departing hence with malice toward all and charity to none, especially the faculty, sign our seven-hundred names in invisible ink.

Sworn before us on this day January 31, 1936,

ESTELLE KURTZ, ESTHER GOLDEN, KATHERINE KOTT.

REALIZATION

It was over now. The dream of four years had become a reality at last. Yet, where was the satisfaction that should have followed? She only felt weak and very empty inside. A lump rose in her throat which she could not swallow, and tears stung her eyes.

The campus was deserted. It was the fifth period, she thought dully. She looked up to the first floor. Yes, there was the economics room in which she had spent so many difficult periods pouring over the Federal Reserve System. Somewhere, it seemed very far off to her, a bell rang announcing the end of the fifth period. Coming out of her reverie, she started forward as if in a hurry, but remembrance overwhelmed her, and her face again assumed its listless expression.

A long line of students emerged from the building. She remained standing in the same place. Her eyes were riveted to the spot where she had spent so many happy hours, but realization of them only overwhelmed her now. She had left the protecting arms of school to go out into a world in which one either conquered or was conquered. She knew now, that she would readily give it all up if only she could once more be part of the life from which she was now severed.

One last look, and she slowly turned and made her way across the campus, into a world of reality.

GRADUATION

Graduation is a joyous occasion
Full of celebration and fun.
For those who don the cap and gown
It is another step upwards
On the stairs of life.
Happy, smiling, triumphant
One and all
As they sit
Diplomas clutched in hands
Listening with ears that do not hear
Looking with eyes that do not see
At the exercises
Dreaming of what is yet to come
Happiness, Success, Triumphs, Achievements.
They are not thinking
Of those left behind.

Announcement

Announcement is made of the registration by the State Education Department of the State of New York, as of the beginning of the present academic year (September, 1935), of the four-year day school curriculum and the six-year evening school curriculum of the School of Accountancy Practice of Pace Institute.

The registration will entitle the graduates of these courses to such experience credit as may be authorized by the regulations of the Commissioner of Education from time to time as partial fulfillment of the requirements for the C.P.A. certificate.

The registration will also cover the recognition of these courses as qualifying students who complete them (and who are otherwise eligible) for admission to the C.P.A. examinations subsequent to January 1, 1938, as provided by Section 1498a of the Education Law.

The substance of the foregoing is that the accountancy courses offered by the School of Accountancy Practice of Pace Institute in preparation for the examination for the certificate of certified public accountant have been accredited by the State Education Department.

OPPORTUNITIES for High School Graduates

There are more opportunities for employment in the field of business today than in any other profession. Many high school principals advise students who have no definite plans to take business courses.

Rhodes School offers courses leading to Secretarial, Accounting and Executive positions in business. Time required depends upon course selected and previous education. High School commercial course graduates complete advanced training quickly and are entitled to employment assistance.
